	All of 26 households in the 12th Pan, Tongch'ang-ni were obliged to join the farm cooperative, while in the 10th Pan, only seven (7) households out of 15 were the members of a farm cooperative. The individual farmers in the
-	latter neighborhood (Pan) were comparatively rich ones having fertile farmlands. However, the most farmers were against the farm cooperative system because of the harder work and worse livelihood.
25.	Upon joining a farm cooperative, farmers had to turn their farm tools into the management of the cooperative, but received, on the other hand more fertilizer than that supplied to individual farmers. They paid in autumn unhulled rice for the fertilizer distributed. Individual farmers lent and borrowed farm tools among themselves. 25X1 village had 26. The Igok Farm Cooperative holding all the farmers in such farm tools as threshers, weeders, and plowing machines, which were all North Korean-made. The cooperative directed to all the members what grain to be planted where. Domestic animals bred in the general area of Tonch'ang-ni, P'annun-gun, 27. were principally cattle, swine, dogs, chickens, cats, and rabbits. The farmers bred cattle for plowing, swine for profitable litters of piglings, dogs for guarding house or for food, chickens for eggs or for food, cats for elimination of rats, and rabbits for food or personal zest. Though the exact name of blight was unknown, it was often found that rice 28. or barley withered to white. Cattle sometimes contracted diarrhea, and chickens usually died, once infected. In or about May 1956, all students of school weregiven preventive injections against encephalitis, which, according to the school teacher, 25X1 caused a high fever to death or deformity. It was then said that a certain 25X1 village was infected with the fever.
